Dear Ms. Sassower:

Thanks for your patience as we completed our review of your request for representation in D.C. Superior Court to defend the charge of disrupting Congress last May. A major storm delayed our monthly meeting of the Legal Committee of our Board until yesterday. Our Legal Director presented your request to the group and showed the videotape of the event. I'm sorry to say that after a full exchange of views, the committee decided that the ACLU should decline to offer you legal help.

PRESIDENT'S COMMITTEE CHAIR
Thomas J. Schneider

There are many ways there can be a good outcome. There is every possibility that the government will not proceed, that police witnesses will not show up, or – even if the government goes to trial, that your own good presentation of obvious flaws in the case will prevail. As you have pointed out from the start, the crime on the books requires a certain state of mind, namely action done “willfully and knowingly” to disrupt. You lacked that intent. In addition, it is not so clear you disrupted anything, as the committee work had ended. If you are able to have counsel, that could help in sharp cross-examination of the government’s witnesses, but you would know much of what needs to be done there as well. We also suggested the line of argument that the statute doesn’t even apply to you, since it could be said there was no hearing, that the gavel had fallen.

ALUMNI ADVISORY COUNCIL CHAIR
Daniel Rapoport

We reserve our limited resources chiefly for cases where we believe new law needs to be made and can be; here, we think the law isn’t vulnerable, that there’s just no likelihood of successful challenge to the ability of Congress to keep decorum in its own rooms. Even if this statute is worded in a way that it arguably doesn’t reach what you did, we imagine Congress could easily revise it to include a perfectly constitutional prohibition on disruption of any hearing or its immediately preceding and following moments, or words to that effect. They simply don’t have to open their work areas as public forums.

We regret we can’t be more help, but we thank you for once again thinking of the ACLU and we wish you the best of luck in getting a successful result in your case.
